ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Two subchapters included in this monograph have been previously published albeit in a different form. The first, “Uses and Misuses of Public Space in Budapest: 1873–1914,” appeared in Budapest and New York: Studies in Metropolitan Transformation, edited by Thomas Bender and Carl E. Schorske. © 1994 Russell Sage Foundation, 112 East 64th Street, New York, NY 10021. Reprinted here with permission. The second, “Department Stores and Middle-Class Consumerism in Budapest, 1896–1939,” was in Cathedrals of Consumption: The European Department Store, 1850–1939, edited by Geoffrey Crossick and Serge Jaumain. © 1999 Ashgate, Aldershot. Reprinted here with permission. I thank both publishers for kindly allowing me to republish my essays.

I am grateful to those who encouraged me to research the topic and even commented on parts of the text: Vera Bácskai, Thomas Bender, Elizabeth Blackmar, Geoffrey Crossick, Leonore Davidoff, the late Péter Hanák, Neil Harris, Serge Jaumain, Ágnes Losonczi, Jon Mathieu, Zsuzsa L. Nagy, the late György Ránki, Roy Rosenzweig, David Sabeau, Ilona Sármany-Parsons, and Carl E. Schorske. I also wish to recognize Zoltán Fónagy, Gyöngyvér Török, Gyula Zeke and Susan Zimmermann, who asked me to write on the themes of this book in earlier publications. Finally special thank are due to András Gerő and Peter Pastor who offered to publish this monograph, and to Thomas J. DeKornfeld for the masterful translation.
